This study presents and analyzes the process by which "new heroes" were invented. It first develops a picture of what constituted heroes in Vietnamese tradition and history, and then shows how the new model, effectively a Sino-Soviet import, was imposed, only to be slowly distorted by its own cultural rationale and by specific objectives.

Our interest is less in whether Phan Boi Châu really was the first to create the collective hero in Vietnam, than in seeing how the communist Vietnamese regime sought, in the period between the two wars (1954-1964), to nationalise an imported figure in order to strengthen its hold in the countryside. The Importing of an Internationalist Model

The new hero of Vietnam formally followed the lead of the Sino-Soviet Stakhanovist model, but the internationalist dimension does not paint the whole picture. Ideologues and intellectuals from the DRV were clever in that they were able to back him up with a genealogy.
